

Utopia

Utopia is an ideal community or society possessing a desirable socio-politico-legal system [1].

Environment

Our utopian society would consist of several energy efficient buildings that rely entirely on renewable energy. The society will be self-sufficient in and produce enough resources for its inhabitants. It will have environmental and agricultural sustainability and extreme hunger and poverty will be eradicated.

System

The utopian society will have its own currency (or credits). Even though every inhabitant will be provided with sufficient credits to live and pay its basic needs, the incentive for working would be the option to gain extra credits to spend on luxury items creating a form of competition. To ensure that prices of goods are fair, the margins of profit will be stated by law (e.g. 25% profit).

The political system would be a democracy where everyone has a chance to vote on the decisions made, there would still be representatives of the people but their decisions would be limited. People would be able to vote on decisions instead of having a representative do it for them.

Rules

There will have to be a system to enforce people to follow the rules of the society. A police force and a legal system would seem obsolete in a utopian society but some of the inhabitants will undoubtedly try to take advantage of the system for personal gain and thus we would still need it.

Values

Actions that add value to the society as a whole will be rewarded above personal gain. This will encourage the inhabitants of this society to help each other instead of choosing the actions that would be best for the individual ■