

Project Utopia

In this ideal society, for convenience called Utopia, the aim is to eliminate all contemporary world issues such as starvation, violence (both mental and physical) and suppression of individuals. My believe is that lust for power is the root of all evil. To eliminate absolute power, power will be decentralized (important decisions will be taken and carried out locally) so that people will have a real political voice in this society. People can vote dysfunctioning and corrupt powerful people away from their functions. To achieve this an online petition can be started. In this society governments serve the people (and not THEIR people) in a way that everybody has enough to eat and can live free as long this doesn't harm other people (or animals). Money will still be used but misusing public money will be treated as a serious crime (a crime against all the people and therefore be serious punished). Also a change of public moral is accomplished. Greedy and selfish behavior will socially not be accepted. People will think and act in terms of society-wide unlike today's society where people think and act as an individual. Social moral is a key value in this society because the real power will be in the hands of the people. The only role for governments is to serve the people, not the other way.

In terms of everyday life I see a free and public transportation system. Houses, foods/drinks, electricity and clothing are free of charge (but there will be a fair use policy off course) and supplied by the government. Also medical care is free of charge and a money-driven pharmacy is forbidden and considered wrong by the people. People have freedom to believe whatever they want (as long as it don't harm other people). The only reason why money still exists in this society is because of luxury. People who violate the law will be put in jail. The highest possible punishment is to be kicked out of this society (and not a life sentence). Although this is the highest possible punishment people are still free to step out of this society voluntary. Nobody is forced to live in the society of Utopia.