

Utopia

Once upon a time, in a world far, far away, people lived in peace. People were happy, led healthy lives and took care of their children and each other. Family was more important the money and power again.

Morals and ethics were groundrules for everyone. And everyone lived by these rules. These rules did not included extremes. Religion was also without extremes, accepted and respected. Creativity was applauded, both in technique as in arts. Alternative ways for using and preserving energy and food were always in development and considered very important.

Pharmaceutical companies designed drugs to cure people, for the good of it, not for the profit. Medicine was freely available for everyone, anywhere. People who were sick, were taken care off, in the best knowledge of the doctors. Doctors shared their knowledge with eachother throughout the world.

People lived in apartments with rooftop-gardens and playgrounds. This way more people could live on the same land, without taking away the much needed green. Alternative ways of transportations were in place, which caused less polution.
