

Utopia

The first thing that comes to my mind when I think of Utopia is the definition of the word, the idea that there could be a perfect world. My first thought of this perfect world consist of green meadows full of flowers, a warm spring sun, a world in which there exists harmony between humans and nature.

When given some deeper thought, the following Utopian world is sketched:

Environment:

My perfect environment would involve a lot of nature, yet the nature doesn't need to be beautiful or rich; the most important thing for me would be that the environment is fun to explore. My ideal environment would be rich of nature and little settlements. The nature should consist of all types, from large deserts to tropical rainforests to mountains reaching far in the sky.

The infrastructure should consist of little dirt roads on the ground, and most of the traffic going by air: this way the landscape would not be influenced by a human influence. Settlements should be guarded by fences which non-humans cannot cross, since in this ideal world the animals should not be restricted. This also means travelling the dirt roads is dangerous, however with technological advancements such as personal shields and stun guns people can freely travel by land if they wish.

I'd like the environment to resemble an earth in which humans and nature can live side by side.

System:

The government should consist of representatives chosen by the people. Other major organizations could be focused on healthcare and education. Each settlement should also have a small group of representatives chosen by the inhabitants, who can arrange matters for their settlement.

Rules:

In a completely perfect Utopia there would be no need for rules, inhabitants would simply never steal, murder, or commit any crime whatsoever.

Moral values:

As stated under rules, the inhabitants of my Utopia would never commit any crime whatsoever. This means they settle disputes with discussions rather than violence. Should a discussion make a turn for the worse, then they can take matters to their local group of representatives, who can rule over the matter.